“Are your company’s retirement plan fees shared equally?”

By Phil Webb

What if you found out that some participants in your company’s 401(k) plan, including you and your fellow executives, were not paying their fair share of plan expenses? Would that surprise you?

Unfortunately, that scenario is all too common. It is also one that could put your plan at risk.

The investment structure of some 401(k) plans has created an uncomfortable situation where some employees are subsidizing the costs of the plan for other employees. When the employees benefiting from this unequal allocation of expenses are executives and fiduciaries to the plan, the potential for fiduciary exposure increases.

COVERING PLAN FEES

Most 401(k) plans use revenue sharing from the mutual funds to pay all or part of the plan expenses. These could be expenses for administration, compliance, recordkeeping or advisory services.

Typically, all of the revenue sharing from the various mutual funds is put into an account within the plan, called a revenue holding account, or ERISA budget account, so named after the Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) of 1974.

The service provider then draws fees from this account. Any fees not covered by this account are billed to the plan sponsor. The bill can be paid by a check from the company, or by splitting the fees evenly among all plan participants.

INEQUITABLE FEES CONCERNS

The problem is that many of the mutual fund investments in the plan pay different amounts of revenue sharing. For example, your plan may contain different share classes of mutual funds, such as “A” shares, “R” shares, “I” shares or index funds. Some “R” shares pay as much as 1 percent in revenue sharing, while “I” shares and index funds may pay substantially less, or even none at all.

Suppose you and your fellow executives are investing your assets in “I” shares or index funds that pay zero revenue sharing. If most of the plan fees paid to the various service providers come from revenue sharing, then the participants investing in these low-cost or low-revenue sharing funds are not really paying their share of plan expenses.

As a result, participants in the higher-cost, and subsequently, higher-revenue sharing funds, end up subsidizing the costs of the plan.

EQUALIZING PLAN COSTS

As the plan sponsor, you have a fiduciary duty to monitor plan fees and revenue-sharing arrangements with your service providers. It is also your responsibility to follow a prudent process with respect to allocating plan costs and revenue sharing.

SO, WHAT IS THE SOLUTION TO UNEQUAL ALLOCATION OF PLAN COSTS?

You could limit your 401(k) plan menu to investment options that have zero revenue sharing built into the expense ratio. However, not all mutual fund families offer such funds. Alternatively, you could employ a record keeper or service provider with the technology in place to ensure that revenue sharing and plan costs are allocated equally.

Or, you could ignore the issue and hope it never comes up. That option, however, could put yourself and the plan at risk.

To minimize liability, it is imperative that you be proactive. And, regardless of which solution you choose, work with a knowledgeable advisor who can help you navigate these complex situations. 🗣️
